RomanHistory AncientRome HonorAndShame CulturalComparison EasternPerspective Understanding Roman society through a lens developed in East Asian, Indian, or other non-Western societies requires a nuanced approach, recognizing that honor and shame are not universal concepts. The Roman framework differs significantly from many Eastern traditions, emphasizing personal virtue, public reputation, and the importance of family lineage in defining one's standing. This analysis delves into the intricacies of these concepts, providing a fresh perspective on a civilization that continues to influence our world.

The Roman Notion of "Honor" and "Shame"

Roman honor, in its essence, was deeply intertwined with public reputation. "Virtus," a key Roman value, encompassed bravery, self-control, and adherence to duty. Individuals strived to cultivate a reputation for integrity and achievement, particularly in the public sphere. Shame, conversely, arose from actions perceived as dishonorable or betraying one's expected role. Public humiliation, ostracization, and loss of social standing were severe consequences. A significant difference between the Roman and Eastern perspective on honor and shame lies in the nature of shame. Eastern traditions often emphasize shame as a personal and internalized feeling, rooted in collective values and the avoidance of social disruption. Roman shame, however, had a stronger external, public dimension. Public disgrace could tarnish family honor and consequently impact future generations. Data Visual: | Feature | Roman Honor | Eastern Honor (Illustrative - Many Variations Exist) | ||| | Primary Focus | Public Reputation, Virtue, Achievement | Internalized Values, Social Harmony, Avoidance of Disruption | | Expression | Public Deeds, Displays of Virtue, Avoidance of Disgrace | Internal Reflection, Apology, Ritual Cleansing | | Consequences | Loss of social standing, ostracism, political exile | Social isolation, family repercussions, loss of respect within the community |

Reading Romans with Eastern Eyes: Honor and Shame in the Apostle's Words

The Apostle Paul's letter to the Romans is a cornerstone of Christian theology, a profound exploration of sin, salvation, and the glorious freedom found in Christ. For centuries, it's been interpreted through a predominantly Western lens, often focusing on individual guilt, legalistic atonement, and personal salvation. But what happens when we approach this foundational text with "Eastern eyes"? What if we consider a worldview deeply rooted in concepts like honor, shame, and community, which are central to many cultures across Asia and the Middle East? The insights gained can be truly transformative, offering a richer, more nuanced understanding of Paul's message. When we talk about "Eastern eyes," we're not implying a monolithic Eastern perspective. Cultures are diverse! However, we can identify certain relational and communal frameworks that often differ from typical Western individualism. For many, identity is less about individual achievement and more about one's place within family, community, and social strata. Honor is a precious commodity, something to be gained and protected, while shame is a potent force, capable of ostracizing individuals and damaging entire families. It's within this honor-shame dynamic that Paul's letters, including Romans, begin to resonate in powerful new ways.

Understanding the Honor-Shame Dynamic

Before diving into Romans, it's essential to grasp the underpinnings of honor and shame. In honor-shame cultures, social standing is paramount.

What is Honor?

Honor can be understood as one's inherent worth and social value. It's not just about personal reputation but also about the respect and status conferred upon an individual by their community. This can be influenced by factors like lineage, achievements, adherence to social norms, and one's ability to provide for and protect their family or group. High honor brings prestige and influence; low honor can lead to exclusion.

What is Shame?

Shame, conversely, is the loss of honor, the exposure of one's failings, weaknesses, or transgressions in the eyes of the community. It's a potent social control mechanism, motivating individuals to conform to societal expectations to avoid public disgrace. Shame is often deeply felt and can carry immense weight, impacting not just the individual but also their family and even their ancestors.

The Relational Nature of Identity

In contrast to many Western cultures that emphasize individual autonomy and self-reliance, honor-shame cultures often prioritize relational interdependence. Identity is fluid and constantly negotiated within the context of relationships. One's actions directly reflect on their family, elders, and community. This relational worldview profoundly influences how we might read scripture.

Romans Through an Honor-Shame Lens

Now, let's apply these concepts to the Epistle to the Romans. Many passages that might seem abstract or legalistic take on a more concrete, emotionally resonant meaning.

Chapter 1: The Wrath of God and Universal Shame

Paul begins Romans with a stark declaration of God's wrath against unrighteousness (Romans 1:18). From an honor-shame perspective, this wrath isn't just a divine punishment but a divine response to profound dishonor. Humanity, by rejecting God, has incurred immense shame.

Idolatry and Dishonor

Paul argues that the rejection of God leads to exchanging God's truth for a lie, worshipping created things rather than the Creator (Romans 1:25). This is the ultimate act of dishonor. It's like a subject betraying their king, a child rebelling against their father. The consequences are not just spiritual but social and relational. The resulting behaviors Paul lists – sexual immorality, greed, malice, envy, deceit – are all acts that bring shame upon individuals and their families in an honor-shame society.

Chapter 2: Judging Others and the Judgment Seat

In Romans 2, Paul condemns those who judge others for the very sins they commit. This resonates deeply with honor-shame dynamics. In such societies, hypocrisy – professing one standard while living another – is a grave offense that brings severe shame.

The Law Written on the Heart

Paul speaks of the Gentiles, who do not have the law of Moses, but do by nature what the law requires (Romans 2:14-15). This "law written on the heart" can be understood as the innate understanding of right and wrong, of honor and dishonor, that God has instilled in humanity. When people violate this inner compass, they bring shame upon themselves and incur God's judgment.

Chapter 3: Everyone Falls Short of God's Glory

Romans 3:23, "for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God," is perhaps one of the most well-known verses. When we read "fall short of the glory of God" through an honor-shame lens, it takes on a powerful new dimension. It's not just about personal sinfulness but about failing to live up to the honor and dignity that God intended for humanity. It's a collective shame, a brokenness that affects all of creation.

Justification by Faith, Not Works

Paul's emphasis on justification by faith alone (Romans 3:28) becomes a powerful antidote to the shame associated with trying to earn honor through deeds. In many honor-shame cultures, there's a constant pressure to perform and prove one's worth. Paul declares that our standing with God is not earned but freely given through faith in Jesus Christ. This is liberating, offering a way out of the exhausting pursuit of external validation.

Chapter 5: Peace with God Through Christ's Sacrifice

The concept of atonement, often understood in the West as legalistic debt cancellation, can be reframed. Christ's sacrifice is a supreme act of honor for God and a profound act of love for humanity, restoring our lost honor.

Reconciliation and Restoration of Honor

Through Christ's death, we are reconciled to God. This reconciliation restores our dignity and honor, making us children of God and heirs of His kingdom. It's not just a transaction but a restoration of relationship, a re-establishment of our rightful place in God's family.

Chapter 8: The Spirit of Adoption and Our Identity

Romans 8 is a rich chapter, and the concept of adoption is particularly significant. Being adopted into God's family means we are no longer slaves to fear and shame but sons and daughters, heirs of God.

"Abba, Father" - A Deeply Relational Cry

The cry "Abba, Father" (Romans 8:15) is a term of intimate endearment, spoken by children to their fathers. In an honor-shame context, this is a declaration of belonging and acceptance. It signifies a secure and honored position within God's family, transcending any earthly status or social standing.

Chapter 12: Living Sacrifices and Community Responsibility

Paul urges believers to present their bodies as living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to God (Romans 12:1). This is not a passive offering but an active, ongoing commitment to live in a way that honors God.

Honoring the Body of Christ

In Romans 12:4-5, Paul speaks of the body having many parts and all performing different functions. This metaphor speaks directly to the interconnectedness of the church as a community. Our actions, both positive and negative, impact the honor and shame of the entire body. We are called to live in such a way that we bring honor to Christ and to each other, avoiding anything that would bring shame upon the church.

Implications for Understanding Romans and Christian Living

Approaching Romans with an honor-shame framework offers several significant implications:

A More Relational Gospel

The gospel message can be understood not just as a personal salvation plan but as a restorative act that re-establishes our broken relationship with God and with each other. It speaks to our deepest need for belonging and acceptance.

The Power of Shame Overcome

Many individuals in honor-shame cultures wrestle with deep-seated shame. The gospel offers a profound liberation from this shame, assuring them of their inherent worth and acceptance in Christ, regardless of past failures or societal condemnation.

Motivations for Obedience

While Western interpretations might emphasize obedience out of a sense of duty or to avoid punishment, an honor-shame perspective highlights obedience as a natural response to God's immense love and grace. We obey to honor the One who has brought us such honor and lifted us from shame.

Community Impact

Understanding honor and shame underscores the importance of community in the life of faith. Our actions have a ripple effect, impacting the reputation and honor of the church. This calls for intentional living that brings glory to God and edifies fellow believers.

Beyond Western Interpretations

The exploration of Romans through an honor-shame lens is not about discarding traditional interpretations but enriching them. It's about recognizing that the Apostle Paul, writing to a diverse audience, likely employed a range of cultural understandings that we may have overlooked in our own cultural contexts. By embracing the insights of honor and shame, we can gain a deeper, more comprehensive understanding of Paul's profound message in Romans. It allows us to see the gospel not only as a path to individual salvation but as a powerful force for reconciliation, restoration, and the reclaiming of our God-given honor, both individually and corporately. This perspective can lead to a more robust, relational, and deeply human expression of faith.

Reading Romans through the lens of Eastern cultural sensibilities offers a profound and enriching perspective on themes of honor and shame—concepts deeply embedded in both Paul’s epistle and the moral frameworks of many Eastern traditions. While the New Testament letter to the Romans was composed within a Roman milieu steeped in civic duty and public reputation, Eastern readers engage with its message through lenses shaped by collectivist values, spiritual introspection, and relational ethics.

The Cultural Resonance of Honor and Shame in Romans

At the heart of Romans lies a tension between divine grace and human responsibility, articulated through Paul’s exploration of righteousness by faith. To readers from Eastern cultures—where honor is often intertwined with family, community, and spiritual integrity—this theological discourse resonates powerfully. Honor here extends beyond personal pride; it reflects a sacred commitment to living in alignment with divine will, maintaining dignity not for self-glory but as a faithful witness to a higher order. Shame, too, is reframed—not merely as social censure, but as a call to humility, repentance, and transformation. The Eastern emphasis on relational harmony and internalized moral discipline complements Paul's call to authenticity and integrity, creating a bridge between ancient Christian thought and timeless cultural values.

Key Insights: Honor as Sacred Duty and Shame as Moral Compass

One of the most compelling insights gained from an Eastern reading of Romans is the understanding of honor not as status, but as a sacred duty. In many Eastern traditions, honor is deeply relational—rooted in one's role within the family, community, and spiritual lineage. This mirrors Paul's insistence that true honor arises from living in obedience to God's truth, not from human validation. Shame, similarly, is not simply vulnerability but a disciplined inner voice urging alignment with ethical and spiritual principles. When viewed through Eastern eyes, Romans becomes a guide not only for individual salvation but for cultivating a life of integrity that reflects divine honor in every action and relationship.

Applications in Daily Life and Community Building

Applying this perspective enriches personal conduct and communal life. For individuals, embracing shame as a constructive force fosters deeper self-awareness and moral growth, encouraging reflection and repentance rather than avoidance or denial. In family and community settings, the Eastern emphasis on shared honor aligns with Paul's vision of believers as a unified body—each member's faithfulness contributing to collective dignity. This synergy inspires practices that reinforce mutual respect, restorative justice, and compassionate accountability, grounding faith in lived experience and cultural wisdom. Such integration nurtures resilient communities grounded in both spiritual truth and cultural authenticity.

Benefits and Lasting Impact

Readers who engage Romans through Eastern sensibilities gain a more holistic and emotionally resonant understanding of grace and responsibility. The fusion of scriptural depth with cultural insight fosters empathy, spiritual maturity, and cross-cultural dialogue. By recognizing honor and shame not as alien concepts but as universal human experiences shaped by faith, individuals cultivate a more compassionate and grounded approach to ethics. This enriched reading transforms Romans from a theological treatise into a living guide for integrity, healing, and relational harmony.

The Future Outlook: Bridging Tradition and Contemporary Faith

As global Christianity continues to grow in culturally diverse contexts, the East-West dialogue on classical texts like Romans becomes increasingly vital. Future explorations of honor and shame in biblical literature must honor these cultural intersections, allowing ancient wisdom to speak meaningfully to modern spiritual journeys. By embracing Eastern perspectives, scholars, pastors, and lay readers alike unlock new dimensions of understanding—deepening faith, strengthening communities, and nurturing a global Christianity rooted in both scriptural truth and timeless human values. Reading Romans with Eastern eyes is more than an academic exercise; it is a spiritual act of reconciliation—one that honors the past while illuminating pathways forward for faith lived with honor, humility, and grace.

Reading Romans with Eastern Eyes: Honor, Shame, and the Gospel's Universal Resonance

The Apostle Paul's letter to the Romans stands as a cornerstone of Christian theology, a profound exposition of God's righteousness, humanity's sinfulness, and the transformative power of faith in Jesus Christ. Yet, for centuries, its interpretation has been largely shaped by Western, individualistic, and guilt-based cultural lenses. What happens when we approach this foundational text through an Eastern, honor-shame cultural framework? The insights are not merely academic; they unlock a deeper, more visceral understanding of the gospel, revealing its profound relevance to a global audience and challenging ingrained Western assumptions about sin, redemption, and community.

This article delves into the rich interplay between the Epistle to the Romans and the honor-shame dynamics prevalent in many Eastern cultures, exploring how this perspective can illuminate Paul's arguments and amplify the gospel's message of reconciliation. We will examine key themes in Romans, re-examining them through the lens of honor and shame, and consider the implications for both theological understanding and practical application in diverse cultural contexts. This exploration is vital for anyone seeking to grasp the universal power of the New Testament, particularly within the vast global population that operates within honor-shame cultural paradigms.

Understanding Honor and Shame: A Different Cultural Compass

Before diving into Romans, it's crucial to establish a foundational understanding of honor and shame as distinct from Western guilt cultures. In guilt-based cultures, morality is often defined by adherence to abstract laws and principles. Individuals feel personal guilt when they transgress these internal or external codes. Public perception is important, but the primary locus of morality is internal.

Conversely, honor-shame cultures place a profound emphasis on one's standing within a community and the opinions of others. Honor is the positive value placed on an individual or group, often tied to reputation, status, and perceived worth. Shame, the inverse of honor, arises from public disgrace, loss of face, or a failure to meet communal expectations. In these societies, maintaining honor and avoiding shame are paramount motivators for behavior.

Key elements of honor-shame cultures include:

- 1. Community and Kinship: Strong emphasis on group identity, family loyalty, and collective responsibility. Individual identity is often subsumed by group identity.

- 2. Reputation and Face: Preserving one's reputation and avoiding public humiliation ("losing face") are critical.
- 3. Status and Hierarchy: Clear social structures and deference to authority are common.
- 4. Reciprocity: A strong sense of obligation and exchange, both in positive and negative interactions.
- 5. Perception of God: God's honor is often linked to the honor of His people.

Recognizing these dynamics is not about cultural relativism but about enhancing hermeneutical accuracy. It allows us to understand why certain concepts might have resonated more powerfully with Paul's original audience and how they can resonate with contemporary audiences who share similar cultural values. The pursuit of honor and the dread of shame are powerful driving forces that shape individual and collective life.

Romans and the Universal Battle for Honor

Paul's letter to the Romans, addressed to a church in the heart of the Roman Empire, was written to a world where honor and shame were deeply ingrained. The Roman imperial system itself was built on a complex web of patronage, patronage, and the bestowal of honor and titles.

Therefore, understanding the gospel through an honor-shame lens allows us to see how Paul masterfully weaves his theological arguments into the very fabric of this cultural reality.

The Universal Sinfulness: Loss of Face for All Humanity

Paul's stark diagnosis of humanity's fallen state in Romans 1-3 is often interpreted through a guilt lens: everyone has sinned and fallen short of God's standard, incurring personal guilt. While true, an honor-shame perspective adds a crucial dimension. The "sin" described by Paul is not merely an infraction of abstract rules; it's a profound loss of God's honor, a collective act of rebellion that brings shame upon humanity. Paul states, "for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Romans 3:23). From an honor-shame perspective, this means that all humanity, in their sin, has failed to reflect God's intended honor and has brought disgrace upon themselves and, by extension, upon their Creator.

The specific sins Paul lists in Romans 1 - idolatry, sexual immorality, greed, malice - are all acts that directly undermine one's honor and bring shame. They are a turning away from the source of true honor (God) towards lesser, created things. This resonated deeply with an audience acutely aware of the importance of proper worship and the divine favor that accompanied it. The concept of "falling short of the glory of God" can be understood not just as failing to meet a divine standard, but as failing to bring glory to God, thereby disgracing His name. This shared disgrace creates a universal need for restoration and renewed honor.

Justification by Faith: Restoring God's Honor and Our Own

The central theme of justification by faith, elaborated in Romans 3:21-5:11, takes on a powerful new resonance when viewed through the lens of honor and shame. Paul argues that righteousness is not earned through works of the law but is a gift received through faith in Jesus Christ. This is not about erasing guilt, but about restoring honor. For those in honor-shame cultures, being declared righteous by God, being brought into His favor, is a profound restoration of honor. It's about being vindicated, having one's reputation restored, and being brought into a position of high status within God's divine community. Jesus' atoning sacrifice is then understood not just as a payment for sin (guilt), but as a public act of divine grace that upholds God's honor while simultaneously restoring the honor of those who believe. By taking on the shame of humanity's sin upon himself, Jesus absorbs the ultimate disgrace, thereby enabling God to bestow honor upon believers. The phrase "declared righteous" (or "justified") can be understood as being publicly vindicated and honored by God. This is a dramatic shift from merely being forgiven to being elevated to a position of favor and dignity.

The concept of "adoption" into God's family (Romans 8:15-17) is particularly potent in an honor-shame context. Adoption is not just about becoming a child; it's about being brought into a noble lineage, receiving inheritance, and sharing in the family's honor. Being adopted by God means gaining an unparalleled honor, a status that transcends all earthly distinctions. This assurance of honor is a powerful antidote to the shame and marginalization that many experience in their earthly lives.

Life in the Spirit: Living a Life of Godly Honor

The indwelling of the Holy Spirit, described vividly in Romans 8, is presented as the source of power for a transformed life. In an honor-shame framework, the Spirit empowers believers to live in a way that brings honor to God and to their community. This is not merely about avoiding sin out of fear of punishment, but about actively pursuing a life that reflects

God's character and draws others to Him. The fruit of the Spirit - love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control (Galatians 5:22-23, often referenced in discussions of Romans) - are all markers of godly character that bring honor.

Living by the Spirit means living in a way that honors God's name and elevates His reputation. It's about embodying the values of God's kingdom, which are inherently honorable. This also extends to how believers interact with each other and with the wider world. The emphasis on love for one another (Romans 12:10, "Be devoted to one another in brotherly love. Honor one another above yourselves.") is not just a moral injunction; it's a call to actively build up the honor of the community and to reflect God's relational nature.

The Church as an Honor Community

Paul's vision for the church in Romans is that of a new, redeemed community where God's honor is paramount. The concept of the church as the "body of Christ" (Romans 12:4-5) is crucial here. Each member, with their unique gifts, contributes to the overall well-being and honor of the body. When one member suffers, all suffer; when one member is honored, all rejoice. This communal aspect is vital in honor-shame cultures where individual identity is so closely tied to the group. The church, when functioning according to Paul's vision, becomes a tangible demonstration of God's redemptive work, a place where honor is bestowed by God and reflected in the lives of His people. This is a powerful counter-narrative to the shame and brokenness of the world. It's a place where individuals, regardless of their past or social standing, can find acceptance, honor, and a renewed sense of worth. The gospel, therefore, is not just an individual salvation but a communal restoration of honor.

Implications for Global Christianity and Mission

The insights gained from reading Romans with Eastern eyes have profound implications for how we understand and communicate the gospel globally, especially in regions where honor-shame dynamics are dominant. Ignoring these cultural frameworks can lead to a gospel that feels foreign, irrelevant, or even offensive.

Communicating the Gospel Authentically

For missionaries and church leaders ministering in honor-shame cultures, understanding these dynamics is not an optional add-on but a fundamental hermeneutical tool. When explaining sin, it's essential to speak of the loss of God's honor and the shame that results, rather than solely focusing on personal guilt. When articulating salvation, the emphasis can be placed on God's gracious restoration of honor, His vindication, and the incredible privilege of adoption into His family.

The cross, then, becomes a powerful symbol of God's willingness to bear shame for our sake, thereby restoring our honor. The resurrection is God's ultimate declaration of victory and vindication, bringing supreme honor to Christ and those who are united with Him. This nuanced approach allows the gospel to resonate more deeply with the lived experiences and cultural sensitivities of people in honor-shame societies.

Building Healthy and Thriving Churches

Churches in honor-shame cultures can leverage this understanding to build strong, cohesive communities.

Emphasizing honor within the church - honoring elders, honoring one another, and collectively striving to bring honor to God - can foster a sense of belonging and purpose.

Addressing conflict through the lens of honor and shame can lead to more effective reconciliation. The fear of shaming the community or losing face can be a powerful motivator for ethical behavior, but it must be balanced with the grace and love that Christ offers.

The church can become a place where individuals who have experienced significant shame and marginalization can find true honor and dignity. This can be a powerful witness to the transformative power of the gospel in a world often characterized by social stratification and the perpetuation of shame.

Moving Beyond Western Bias

Finally, engaging with Romans through an honor-shame lens challenges the long-held Western bias in theological interpretation. It demonstrates that the gospel is not a Western import but a divine revelation with universal implications. By embracing diverse cultural hermeneutics, we gain a richer, more complete understanding of Scripture and a more effective means of sharing its life-changing message with the entire world. The insights from studying Romans with Eastern eyes highlight the profound and enduring power of the gospel to meet people where they are, on their own terms, and to offer them a redemption that addresses their deepest needs for acceptance, dignity, and belonging.

In conclusion, the Epistle to the Romans, when read with an awareness of honor and shame dynamics, reveals even greater layers of meaning. It speaks to the universal human yearning for acceptance, worth, and dignity, offering a vision of salvation that restores both our relationship with God and our standing within His redeemed community. The gospel's message of honor is indeed a powerful force for transformation, resonating across cultures and across time.

Questions & Answers About reading romans with eastern eyes honor and shame

No	Question	Answer
1	What does 'honor and shame' in Roman society actually mean, and how does it differ from modern Western concepts?	In Roman culture, honor was a public and quantifiable status, often gained through achievement, reputation, and adherence to social norms. Shame was the public exposure of failing to uphold these standards, leading to social ostracism. This contrasts with modern Western views where honor can be more individualistic and shame often internalized.
2	How does understanding the honor-shame dynamic change the way we read New Testament epistles, particularly those addressed to Roman audiences like Romans?	Recognizing honor and shame provides crucial context for understanding motivations and arguments in Romans. Paul's letter can be seen as a strategy to enhance the honor of believers and protect them from shame within the Roman social hierarchy, thereby strengthening their faith and community.
3	Can you give an example of how honor and shame play out in the book of Romans?	Certainly. Paul's emphasis on God's righteousness and salvation through faith can be understood as offering believers a new, higher status (honor) in God's eyes, which transcends any potential shame they might face from Roman society for their beliefs and practices.

4	What is the significance of 'face' in the context of reading Romans through an honor-shame lens?	'Face' in this context refers to one's social standing and reputation. For Romans, losing face meant profound shame. Understanding this helps us grasp the weight of Paul's exhortations and the potential social consequences of living out their Christian faith.
5	How does the concept of 'patronage' in Roman society relate to honor and shame, and how might this appear in Romans?	Patronage was a system where a patron provided protection and resources in exchange for loyalty and service, enhancing the patron's honor. Paul, in Romans, positions God as the ultimate Patron, offering unparalleled honor and security to believers who commit their loyalty to Him.
6	What role does 'reputation' play in the honor-shame framework when interpreting Romans?	A good reputation was paramount in Roman society. Paul is deeply concerned with the reputation of the Christian community and the gospel itself. He works to ensure that believers maintain a good reputation both within the church and in the wider Roman world, thus bringing honor to God.
7	How does the fear of shame influence the actions of characters or groups described in the book of Romans?	The fear of shame, or bringing shame upon oneself or one's family, was a powerful motivator. In Romans, this fear might have prevented some from embracing Christianity due to potential social disapproval. Paul addresses this by reframing where true honor and security lie – in Christ.

8	Are there specific passages in Romans that are particularly illuminated by an honor-shame interpretive approach?	Yes, passages dealing with suffering (Romans 5:3-5), evangelism (Romans 10:14-15), and ethical living (Romans 12) are greatly clarified. Paul's arguments often revolve around securing lasting honor in God while mitigating the shame associated with worldly persecution or perceived weakness.
9	How can understanding honor and shame in Romans help contemporary Christians navigate their own social pressures and values?	By examining Romans through this lens, contemporary Christians can better discern between worldly pressures that might lead to shame and the enduring honor found in faithfulness to God. It encourages a re-evaluation of where true social standing and validation come from.
